Application Form Screenshot A: You don't need VB.NET for your .NET application, all you need is the .NET 2.0 Client Profile (from Visual Studio) plus the forms control from System.Windows.Forms. Using the forms control and some of the controls in System.Windows.Forms you can provide a user-interface for your application. If you want to "tell" the application what database to connect to, you must provide a ConnectionString property. If you want the user to be able to add/edit/delete records you need to implement IQueryable on your Data Access Class. When I wanted to build a forms application I would start by implementing a simple Data Access class with some simple CRUD operations. Once I had that working I would then move on and build a forms application around the Data Access class. If I needed more functionality, I would look at the standard .NET Forms controls provided in System.Windows.Forms - I used several controls to build my forms application. Here is a quick example of a Windows Forms application that I built to show you some of this in action. (Note: The above link is the download for the QuickSnippet example.)

Public Class Form1
    Private _connection As MyDataAccessClass
    Private _records As List(Of MyDataRecord)
    Private _dataTable As DataTable
    Private _addButton As Button
    Private Sub Form1_Load(ByVal sender As System.Object, ByVal e As System.EventArgs) Handles MyBase.Load _records = New List(Of MyDataRecord)
        _addButton = New Button
    End Sub
End Class
