What's New In Double Vision?

Google Chrome has a Double Vision mode (click on the Chrome button to enable it). When enabled, Double Vision will use native desktop video card acceleration to watch videos, create pseudo-transparent windows and browse the web. This feature requires a video card that supports the OpenGL 2.0 and OpenGL ES 2.0 extensions. Click on the "Go Double Vision" button to enable. If you have a video card, just follow these steps: 1. Plug-in your video card (if you do not have one or a laptop without a built-in video card, you must use the Double Vision test) 2. Under video -> settings, set "Mirrored stereo" to "On". 3. Go to chrome://flags and enable "Enable Double Vision" (if it is not already enabled). The plugin should now work. You can test Double Vision by watching a video in Google Chrome. When you watch a video, your video card will perform the 3D rendering necessary to play the video and display it with the application. If Double Vision is enabled, you will also be able to have a pseudo-transparent "chrome" window for accessing open windows and your applications. For more information, visit Now you can add a pseudo-transparent Chrome window by following these steps: 1. Start a new Google Chrome window. 2. On the top right of the new window, click on the Chrome menu icon -> More tools -> "Double Vision" 3. The "Double Vision" window will be a second window (this is really just a Chrome extension that does the rendering). Once you click on the "Double Vision" icon, the window will become your pseudo-transparent window. 4. To open an app or website, open it normally. A pseudo-transparent Windows 7 and Windows 8 Aero window. An image with a transparent window when the Double Vision plugin is enabled. Transparent Chrome windows. Double Vision is a useful plugin for people with Intel video cards. For those of us with nVidia and ATI video cards, the plugin is not so useful because they do not have the OpenGL extensions required for the plugin to work. For more information, visit When you click on the "Video player" menu item, Chrome will begin to download the page (video) and a "Double Vision" window will appear in the top right corner of your browser.
